The strikers had patrols out, and when the train came to a halt for the railroad crossing the engine was uncoupled from the train, the fire was pulled out and the engine scarcely had enough steam to slowly pull into the round house, the sheriff sitting on the tender, "monarch of all he surveyed," but powerless to do anything.

St. Superistendent Golden had an engine ready to take a train out, and the sheriff, Judge Keiso and a few others were on the engine ready to go with the train. As the engine pulled out of the round house the pony switch engine was run down on the main track in such a way as to impede its progress, and the freight engine.
